About The Residency

The Contemporary Native Arts Program (CNAP) at the University of South Dakota seeks applicants for the first Northern Plains Indian Artist Residency (NPIAR). Artists who are registered members of a tribe in the Northern Plains region are eligible to apply for the residency. The artist-in-residence will spend the entire month of June living and working at the University of South Dakota. The artist will be expected to work on a new or ongoing visual arts project.

CNAP Goals

The CNAP program wishes to support Native artists interested in combining traditional native arts practices with new media approaches, technology-based methods, or applicants wishing to broaden the distribution of their art using technology and/or social media. The purpose of the residency is to encourage Native artists to access and use technologies for the preservation, dissemination, and enhancement of their artistic work.

The CNAP program encourages emerging and mid-career American Indian artists to recognize their audience and develop a career path that is successful according to their own assessment of artist purpose and wellbeing. The residency will offer guidance on how to develop career plans and trajectories in either commercial or nonprofit sectors.

Residency package

Artist Residency Stipends: To create a prestigious residency for meeting the project goals of increasing access to native arts and preserving and protecting indigenous practices, funds for a competitive residency supported by MACF are budgeted as follows

- General Living Stipend- $3,000: By offering a competitive living subsidy to offset costs incurred while participating in residency, the project leaders believe the residency will attract a high-quality pool of applicants in underserved communities. The NPIAR selection committee recognizes that artists with existing support systems in place often attend residencies, for example artists holding academic/teaching jobs or artists with a spouse who subsidizes their artistic career. The NPIAR selection wants to include candidates without those existing support systems by including a 'living stipend' in the residency budget. This will make the residency highly competitive and unlike any other in the region.
- Materials Stipend- $3000: The artist will create a new project during the residency and we will offer a material stipend to cover the costs of art supplies.
- Technology Stipend- $3,000: The technology portion of the stipend is designed to support the purchase of a domain name for website creation, video camera or other documentary equipment. By allowing the resident to promote the Native Arts that he/she will practice, the technology stipend will ensure meeting the overall project goals.

About The Residency

Activities: The artist-in-residence will have the opportunity and expectation to.....

- Conduct research at the Oral History Center and the Archives and Special Collections in the I.D. Weeks Library at USD
- Conduct research on works in the Robert Penn Contemporary Indian Art collection and the Oscar Howe permanent collection at USD
- Start a new body of creative work or work towards the completion of an on-going project that will integrate new media, new methodologies, or technologies with traditional Native arts practices, history, and culture.
- Learn how to market his or her artwork through three marketing sessions with three different Native arts dealers, curators or gallerists
- Begin a strategic plan to exhibit and promote their work to a broader arts community
- Present his or her research and burgeoning art project, started at the residency, to a public audience throughout the duration of the residency
- Participate in a studio visit, open to the public, where guests may visit the artist in his/her studio and ask the artist questions about his/her process and concepts addressed in the new body of work
- Use studio, facilities, and equipment in the College of Fine Arts
- Study traditional Native American themes, icons, and symbols in the fine art, oral history, and special collections at USD
- Be encouraged and trained to use the graphics lab and digital equipment in the College of Fine Arts facilities to incorporate new media and technology-based concepts into their artistic practice
- Create contemporary art projects that incorporate research of traditional Native arts media and methods, for instance quillwork, traditional dyes, etc.
- Create a personal artist website with a technology assistant (if he/she does not already have one)
- Learn to use social media to promote his/her artwork
- Receive two critiques and/or demonstrations (of traditional Native art methods) during the residency from a peer or elder teaching for the Oscar Howe Summer Art Institute or from staff members at other Native Arts institutions in South Dakota, for example the Akta Lakota Museum
- Receive three marketing sessions on how to promote his or her art within and outside of South Dakota
- Give an artist's presentation, open to the public and for faculty and students attending the OHSAI, for feedback and insights on the new project
- Live in university housing to be close to studio space and study collections
- Receive a materials stipend to purchase traditional Native art supplies and other art supplies
- Receive a technology stipend to establish an online presence via a website or to purchase cameras or other digital equipment to support creative work and visibility
- Receive a general stipend to offset living expenses while the artist attends the residency
- Exhibit his or her work in a solo exhibition, open to the public, during the following exhibition season after the residency. The solo exhibition will take place at the University Art Galleries at USD
- Show their work to patrons of the visual arts, collectors, and other curators
